

Charity hunt Easter eggs go missing

World

UK

Sport

Showbiz

Business

Technology

Odd

The Post Box Egg, designed by Benjamin Shine, has gone missing in central London (Action for Children/PA)

Published: 8:07pm, 25th February 2012

Updated: 10:51pm, 25th February 2012

Two giant eggs which went on display as part of a charity Easter egg hunt have gone missing, a charity has said.

The Post Box Egg, designed by Benjamin Shine, and Natasha Law's egg called Hatch were two of 200 placed across London to raise money for the Action for Children and Elephant Family charities.

But the organisers of the Faberge Big Egg Hunt say that the eggs, which were due to be auctioned on March 20, have disappeared.

A spokesman said: "We are all devastated. Benjamin's post box egg was already a firm favourite with children and families taking part in the hunt.

"We appeal to whoever took the eggs to return them so they can continue to delight London and help raise vital funds for two charities who have worked so hard to put this on.

"The eggs can be returned to 104-108 Curtain Road, London or call 020 3124 0661. We are putting on extra security for all the eggs, and ensuring that they are safe, so people can continue to enjoy them and take part in the hunt.

"We really appreciate everyone's support and concern. The hunt, the fun

UK headlines

Doctors plan industrial action vote

Sun on Sunday makes 'decency' vow

Streep's Oscar hopes for Iron Lady

Cancer drugs 'delayed to cut costs'

